I play their games with them, their chess with jockeys. I play the game without the players and beat them at that. And they threaten me with swords of flame. -Theocritus, 17-20 October 10, 2001 The Pennsylvania Gazette 8/25/19 VESTIBULE IN K As a young adult and later as a father, I have felt profound ambivalence toward ambition. In this photo-essay I look at the vestibule of the Palmer Museum as an example of the belief that ambition is destructive and that it is the driver of government policy. Recently I watched with fascination as the plans for Pennsylvania Avenue and the Mall South were unveiled to the public. Yet these facilities will be built for the exclusive use of the very people who now suffer the debilitating effects of pollution and who are so impoverished that some of them have to buy food on the hoof. We have a whole generation who are too young to appreciate the beauty of these elegant structures. They will be built with money that comes from those who will be unable to ride them. The pavilion in the foreground is covered with fabric which has been worn by the thousands who wash in the fountains. It is an object lesson in the difference between power and powerlessness. What struck me about this photograph is that I have an eye for beauty, but this is not what I photograph. It takes no more than the most cursory review of our history to see how effective ambition is at not only generating wealth, but damaging and distorting our society. Certainly at the beginning of my life the idealists had the power. It was they who
